Note that the political violence - suffered by both the law and order and the general population - sparked by electromagnetic issues and injury to the general population is an emerging problem that may have to be contended with in more and more nations unless proper exposure standards and electromagnetic hygiene are introduced and implemented.

When environmental (and not just personal/marketing-induced choice) exposure levels are tending to double / triple annually, and larger number of exposure casualties outnumber "acceptable" risk/collateral damage to highly visible numbers in densely populated parts of tense population cluster, one must not expect submission from the outraged general population, especially in societies where family ties and bonds are strong and vibrant.

Think of the well-know case of the mothers of Argentina who overthrew the dictatorship of military might after losing their children, simply marching in the streets of Buenos Aires.

Are we going to see such manifestations overthrow technology implementation forging ahead without control?

Let this case in Israel show that such emerging rage is cross-cultural, apolitical, and easily aimed at local authority.

Yes, this became national headlines, one woman from the Village said on the radio that there are now 92 cancer cases in the village when 10 years ago there were zero, this is the reason they blame the antenna. She said the cellular companies say that there is no proof of link between antennas and cancer, but she knows it is not true.

But the violence became the main headlines and the reason was put aside (spin?). The news dealt with whether the police handled this case well or did it not learn from past events, and there were discussions (TV) on the relations between the Druz and jews in Israel and whether this case puts the relations at risk.

The people of the village received an early notice about the police arrival, they hid and waited for the police with stones in hands, 200 policemen arrived at the place and it turned into this total mess.
